On the dualistic nature of discourse processing:
Linguistic and neurolinguistic observations

Bernd Heine
University of Cologne

In the paper to be presented it is argued that there is converging evidence in support of the hypothesis that linguistic discourse has a dualistic organization which is based on the distinction between a microstructure and a macrostructure. This distinction shows significant neurolinguistic correlations, and these correlations concern the lateralization of the human brain.